In the last decades, we have experienced not only the violent imposition of neoliberal reforms and governmentality, but also the emergence of the common(s) as a key issue both in theoretical and political terms. In this lecture, we will try to define the common(s) and discuss its relationship with neoliberal capitalism in terms of dispossession, expropriation, and configuration. Finally, we will debate to what extent the common(s) can be thought as an alternative form of cooperation and self-government with regard to neoliberalism and the role of the state.
